James Winterstein,DC, in his 15th year as president of National University of Health Sciences (formerly National College of Chiropractic), has announced plans to leave his position on April 30, 2003. At that date, Dr. Winterstein will continue to work for the university as president emeritus for another six years.

The board of trustees of the NUHS has voted to appoint David Wickes,DC, as Dr. Winterstein's successor. Dr. Wickes, a long-time associate and colleague of Dr. Winterstein, is NUHS senior vice president and provost, and has been a faculty member for 22 years. A 1977 graduate of the NCC, he has served as student clinic director; department of diagnosis chairman; training and assessment center director; and vice president of academic affairs.

"Although I will miss the day-to-day activity that is part of the presidency, and will especially miss working so closely with my colleagues, I must admit that I look forward to a less strenuous time during which I can continue to represent the university and its purposes under the direction of a president," said Dr. Winterstein.

Dr. Winterstein graduated from NCC in 1968, and served as assistant director of the campus clinic until 1971, when he was named chairman of the department of radiology. He left National for private practice in Florida in 1973, returning to National in 1985 as dean of clinics. He was appointed president of the college in 1986.

Dr. Winterstein's vision for the college reached fruition in September 2000, when the diversification and expansion of the curricula evolved the institution into the National University of Health Sciences.
